Bonefish

Bonefish are a type of saltwater fish that are found in tropical and subtropical waters around the world. They are typically silver in color and have a long, slender body. Bonefish are known for their speed and agility, and they are often referred to as the "grey ghosts" of the flats. Anglers love to catch bonefish because they are a challenging fish to catch. They are also a very good eating fish.

Bonefish can be caught using a variety of methods, including fly fishing, spinning, and baitcasting. The most popular method is fly fishing. Bonefish are typically found in shallow water, and they are often sighted by anglers as they cruise the flats. Fly anglers will often use a long, light rod and line to cast a small fly to the fish. Bonefish are very wary fish, so it is important to make a delicate presentation.

If you are lucky enough to hook a bonefish, be prepared for a fight. Bonefish are strong fish, and they will often make long runs. It is important to keep your drag set light, and to let the fish run when it wants to. Eventually, you will be able to tire the fish out and bring it to the boat.

Tarpon

Tarpon are a type of saltwater fish that are found in tropical and subtropical waters around the world. They are typically silver in color and have a large, round body. Tarpon are known for their strength and power, and they are often referred to as the "silver king" of the flats. Anglers love to catch tarpon because they are a challenging fish to catch. They are also a very good eating fish.
